Name _____

Cursive is a valuable skill, and it should still be taught in elementary school. Studies show that writing in cursive helps parts of the brain develop in ways keyboarding does not.
Brain development is also called learning, and most reasonable people agree that schools should promote learning, so it makes sense to keep

requiring cursive as a learning aid.

Not only would students be maintaining the long tradition of cursive penmanship, but they would also become better learners overall. Some would argue that technology makes cursive outdated and slow, but it is important to remember that what is past is not always the most effective. Since cursive helps young brains develop in many ways, we should keep it.
